SECTION PROGRAMME

PLATFORM

Political Economy Beyond Boundaries aims to develop a sustained research network of scholars working in and beyond International Studies to promote critical research on the global political economy. Grounded in growing calls to diversify the disciplinary focus of (International) Political Economy, the section offers a home for scholars to study contemporary capitalism and its gendered and racialised operation at the global, local and household levels. The section aims to advance an explicitly ‘global’ outlook for political economy research and provide concrete roadmaps to overcome the pitfalls of Eurocentric knowledge production in (International) Political Economy. To this end, the section prioritises and promotes knowledge produced in and for the global South. We are keen to utilise this platform as a vehicle to design meaningful collaborations between scholars in the global South and North.

PEBB works towards a genuinely global political economy by encouraging contributions from Global South scholars and those working from more marginalised sites in the global economy. Beyond this, we encourage a shift in focus to those geographical sites and locations, which are vital to and formative of the current political economic and ecological moment, such as the plantation, the mine, the household.

We believe that it is vital to mobilise scholars working on the recovery and development of radical analytical frameworks and concepts, including racial capitalism, extractivism, abolition political economy, and genuinely intersectional feminist political economy. Our section provides space for scholars working on the pressing problems of the day in which environmental harm, race, gender, and sexuality are all linked through political–economic processes. We aim to create a space which centres global South theorists of political economy, rather than reproducing the global South as a space to which European theory is applied.
